soft- It has become impossible for any tolerably. intelligent man to believe in the doctrines creek preached. There are attempts to pass off downnear | right impostures or corious natural phenomena as at all miracles, which can excite nothing but ridicule; their and the curé, gets into difficulties with his bishtheir ops by exposing one such performance which Dal has obtained some credit in his parish. There ramer are equally abourd attempts to enforce an im-about possible discipline. A bishop orders that all nersons who die whilst intoxicated are to be refused the rites of Christian burial. respectable old peasant dies from apoplery whilst drinking after a fair, and the curé is severely reprimanded for burying him, in discrepant of the order. A fast country gentleman which next dies by drinking a bottle of braudy at a at draught, to win a bet. This time the curé retovel. fuses to bury him, and is discharged from the the his office for his want of Christian charity.

This last misfortune illustrates another growing e, he wil. The intelligence of the country having the been alienated, it has become the duty of the hood. parish priest to collect a few women as devotes, asc. and to stimulate their piety by inculcating re-I his ligious mysticism and enthusiasm at the ex-ding, penso of rational religion. These women that become a kind of spiritual body-guard, entitled, tween in their turn, to exercise a certain influence upon their pastor. Ladies of aristocratic families have, in a higher aphere, an influence upon the bishop similar to that which the humbler women exercise upon the country apple cure. It is by the backstairs intrigues of one fast, of those ladies that the cure is punished for from from refusing burial to the disreputable country og to gentleman. He afterwards meets with a lady from of still more malign influence, who plays to an to him the part of Potiphar's wife, and finally oman ruins him in the esteem of his bishop. If we would may trust the care's description, this feminine influence, which naturally results from the unta-gonism of the Church to the mesculine intel-lect, has become all-pervading and all-corrupting, ment Moreover, in France it is specially injurious, and because the cure is there an absolute slave of his ice of bishop. The bishop has become like the general of avec an army, to whom the unlocky cure stands in the urse, relation of a private soldier, ordered from one note post to another at the arbitrary will of his suho is perior. One hishop removes the cure from his a parish, assigning no other reason than that he rions has griered "the pious souls" of the parish, the ogies "pious souls" consisting of two or three old that devotes who have had a petty quarrel with him, ng to and whose interference in the parish business the be bas resented. His attempted reform during te as his gleam of prosperity consists in declaring evils the curer of the diocese to be irremovable exvell apoplexy. The unlucky M. Bartomicus is left nen exposed to the malice of his enemies, and sees ling; no way of life open to him but that which, on take, the authority of the Bishop of Oxford, we know the to be the normal and of a degraded French a did priest. He becomes a cabman. The infamy of is to this position is to his mind so-great that he andy carefully conceals it from his mother and his inges whered Felicie, leading them to believe that he is employed in a public office. Unfuckily Félicie onth. comes to Paris one day, and calls a cab, with ped; a view of visiting M. Bertomicux's mother—a ongh poor old woman who follows him throughout bis nisfortunes. He tries to conceal himself, but few his efforts are in vain "Oui Félicie," he you exclaims, " c'est vrai. Je suis celui à qui vous riend arez dit: Cocher, payer-rous!" The lady had a the netually trusted the cabman to take his own very fare out of a napoleon-perhaps in obedience in- to some occult sense of sympathy. The avowal reguires too much. Poor Felicie goes home and Lord dies of an aneurism; and Bertomieur writes land his memoirs on scraps of paper and flying that leaves often in pencil, at the corner of the Rue peck Monthabor and the Rue de Luxembourg, on the why miscrable scat of his cab. Let us hope he has made a good thing of it during the present year.

In point of salary, his position must, we would quite think, have been better than when he was a rish country curate. It would be difficult to say anything new upon the influence of celibacy; and M. Bertomieux's oyed experience upon this point seems to prove little the beyond the obvious truth that, when a beautiful Vavat and accomplished girl falls desperately in love the with you, it is very unpleasant to be forbidden and to marry her. In another direction, his comone, plaints are rather less familiar to Englishmen. out The working of the French system, according con. to his description, is something as follows:bited. The Ultramontane party has succeeded in crush-usic; ing the privileges of the French clergy, and has nous, given a retrograde direction to French theology. intelligent man to believe in the doctrines erect preached. There are attempts to pass off downpear | right imposturesor carious natural phenomenuss at all miracles, which can excite nothing but ridicule; heir and the curé, gets into difficulties with his bishtheir ops by exposing one such performance which Dul. has obtained some credit in his parish. There amer are equally absurd attempts to enforce an imabout possible discipline. A bishop orders that all persons who die whilst intexicated are e refused the rites of Christian hurial A respectable old pessant dies from apoplery whilst drinking after a fair, and the curé is neverely reprimanded for burying bim, in disregard of the order. A fast country gentleman thich next dies by drinking a bottle of brandy at a cot draught, to win a bet. This time the cure recovel, fuses to bury him, and is discharged from the big office for his want of Christian charity in- This last misfortune illustrates another growing e, he evil. The intelligence of the country having a the been alienated, it has become the duty of the hood. parish priest to collect a few women as devotes, case, and to atimulate their piety by inculcating religious mysticism and cothusinsm at the exding. pense of rational religion. These women that become a kind of spiritual body-guard, entitled, ween in their turn, to exercise a certain influence utive upon their pastor. Ladies of aristocratic fa-teon- milies have, in a higher aphere, an influence 28 19 upon the bishop similar to that which the the humbler women exercise upon the country mple curé. It is by the backstairs intrigues of one fart, of those ladies that the curé is punished for from refusing burial to the disreputable country g to gentleman. . He afterwards meets with a lady from of still more malign influence, who plays to en to him the part of Potiphar's wife, and finally man ruing him in the esteem of his hishop. If wa ould may trust the cure's description, this feminine inony. fluence, which naturally results from the untagonism of the Church to the masculine intellect, has become all pervading and all corrupting ment Moreover, in France it is specially injurious, because the cure is there an absolute slave of his ce of bishop. The bishop has become like the general of ares an army, to whom the unlacky cure stands in the post to another at the arbitrary will of his suho is perior. One bishop removes the cure from his of a parish, assigning no other reason than that he ious has grieved "the pious souls" of the parish, the "pions souls" consisting of two or three old doutes who have had a petty quarrel with him, and whose interference in the parish business he has resented. His attempted reform during re no his gleam of prosperity consists in declaring evils the curés of the diocese to be irremovable except by a legal decision: and he is finally dis-and missed, in consequence of this scheme being found in his handwriting, by a bishop who pubour licly regrets that the Inquisition is no longer nation possible, and orders bim to shut bimself up for er- life in a convent, where, as a great mercy, he this is allowed vegetables as well as bread and other water. This order he disobeys, but it is at the irect price of abandoning his profession and descending to make his living on a cab stand. the Of the accuracy of this picture we do not gies. express any opinion, and still less need we say. some whiether it contains any warning which may rated be useful beyond the limits of the French Church. But it is a plausable, if perhaps an exaggerated, complaint, and the book may be studied with interest by those whose stomach for fiction is not turned by a large allowance of preaching.

Shooting-stars and Meteors. It has been remarked that shooting stars are much more commonly seen in the months he is from July to December than in those from tra- January to June. Remembering that this and northern hemisphere, it is easily reconciled with gent | the modern theory; when we consider that the les porth pole is on the forward hemisphere of the earth (considered with reference to her orbital motion) during the first-named period, and on the rear (or sheltered) homisphere during the second. Again, it has been remarked that ry in shooting stars are seen more commonly in the imbi- hours after midnight, and that aerolites fall fami- more commonly before noon. In other words, d, of these extraneous hodies reach the earth (or her apont, midnight to noon than in those from noon to midnight. Humboldt suggests, in explanation, in the we know not what theory of variation in the zerat ignition powers of different hours. But it is bter, clear that the true explanation is founded on the principle presented in the preceding paragraph, since the forward hemisphere contains places ders, whose local time lies, roughly speaking, m in between midnight and noon, while places whose cum- local hour lies between noon and midnight lie efore on the sheltered hemisphere. If we remember ed to that the earth is but a point in space, we may elicie fairly conclude that the number of bodies composing meteor-zones is all but infinite. Large, her therefore, as the numbers of these bodies which, Her fall on the earth may be, there is no reason to hat suppose (perhaps, if we knew the true functions of these bodies, we might say—there is no reawill perceptibly diminished. Although the contrary opinion is of sever pressed, it is demonstrable that hut avery small proportion only of the shooting stars which become visible to us can escape from they course, that they must reach the carth, probably namy in a dispersed and divided state. It seems t thens us, indeed, not wholly improbable that some of shes, those elements which the lightning-spectrum ty to shown to exist in the atmosphere may be due to with the perpetual dissipation and precipitation of the substance of shooting stars.
